

As mayors and locally elected officials from both large cities and rural communities in the Southwest, we are united in support of improved urban and agricultural water conservation as means to improve our communities' water security and sustain a healthy flowing Colorado River for generations to come. The recently completed Colorado River Basin Study demonstrated that water conservation and re-use alone can yield at least 3 million acre feet of water and is the most cost-effective and easily implementable way to bring water supply and demand on the Colorado River back into balance. We urge the state and federal officials and other stakeholders who are now meeting to consider follow up steps to the study to produce actionable proposals that can realize this potential for the sake of the river that gives the Southwest life and the economic future of our region.
